Daniela Friebel, recipient of the 2018 Haus am Kleistpark photography work grant, has been exploring territories of nightingales in Berlin. Beginning August 22nd, she will be presenting her work in a multi-layered photographic installation in the project space of the Haus am Kleistpark.

Berlin is the capital of nightingales. In spring, the males' whistles and trills fill the whole city, and not just a few appear to amplify their song by singing close to bridges. Sometimes they can even be heard next to a passing S-Bahn train. Nightingales are faithful to their habitat and return to the same place every year.

Daniela Friebel set off on nocturnal forays to seek out nightingales in Berlin and then shot these same urban spaces during the day. The images, taken between Platz der Luftbrücke and Mauerweg, show everyday places which otherwise receive little attention. The artist also recorded the birds' songs, which they use to claim their territory. The songs form part of the exhibition concept as sound installation and graphic visualization.

The artist works with photography as a medium that shifts perception and makes changes of perspective possible. With this project, Daniela Friebel not only casts a poetic glance onto our city, but makes the tension between nature and urban space visible. At the same time, she reflects the term "Revier" (territory) in a subtle way. The result is a remarkable project in which art and science intertwine.

Daniela Friebel, *1975 in Berlin, studied photography at the Academy of Fine Arts in Leipzig with Timm Rautert and Christopher Muller. Since receiving her master's degree in 2011 she has realized numerous exhibitions.
